

I'm human

A movie review detailing its content ratings and graphic scenes: The film receives a content rating of 5, indicating that it contains explicit material. It has a sex & nudity score of 2 out of 38, with one scene featuring full topless exposure at the 1 hour and 3 minute mark. A short scene shows a car bouncing due to a man and woman's sexual activity without any actual nudity. Violence and gore are prevalent throughout the film, earning it a score of 14 out of 756. Scenes depict killings, blood splatters, and bullet wounds on characters' faces and bodies. Infrequent but brutal violence occurs, often in slow motion, with realistic sound effects that add to the intensity. The movie also contains profanity, scoring 2 out of 555 for explicit language. A character uses derogatory terms for Italians, while another says "cocksucker" a few times. Alcohol and cigarette smoking are present throughout the film, contributing to its moderate score in these categories. Frightening and intense scenes are plentiful, with some viewers finding them severe. The overall tone of the movie is bleak, even when the mood is lighter. The last half hour is particularly sorrowful, adding to the overall somber atmosphere. The movie follows Frank Sheeran (Robert DeNiro), a veteran who becomes a hitman for the Bufelino crime family after being approached by Russell Bufelino (Joe Pesci). The film explores his involvement with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters and his rivalries with Jimmy Hoffa (Al Pacino). With a runtime of nearly four hours, the movie delves into themes of ageing and violence. The Irishman is a talented but unoriginal gangster film that falls short due to its lack of creativity and excessive violence. With an all-star cast, including DeNiro, Pesci, and Pacino, the movie's performances are its redeeming quality. However, the film's graphic content, including profanity, bloodshed, and explicit scenes, makes it unsuitable for family viewing or casual audiences.
